How to Feel Excited About Life Again

By Max (@MaxTorchbearer)

You don’t have to wait until life gets better to start wanting tomorrow to arrive.
Excitement begins earlier than most people think.
But only when one condition is met.

You can know exactly what you want from the next five years and still feel nothing about tomorrow.

Your calendar can be full. Your goals can be clear. Deadlines are coming. People expect things from you. There’s plenty ahead, but most of it feels like something to manage, complete, or prepare for.

That’s why “find something to look forward to” is incomplete advice. You may already have plans, ambitions, and a clear picture of the life you want.

A few things ahead can change the feel of the days leading up to them.

Most of what you say you want never does.

Most of what you want only feels close

You can spend an hour researching a place you want to visit and feel more alive than you have all week.

For a moment, the future feels close.

Then you close the tab.

By morning, the trip’s back where it was, somewhere inside “one day.”

The same thing happens when you plan a project, picture a different career, or imagine moving somewhere new. While you’re thinking about it, the future feels vivid. Once your attention returns to ordinary life, it recedes again.

You can want something for years and keep recreating the feeling without ever creating anything you can genuinely look forward to.

So what turns a future you enjoy imagining into one you can actually look forward to?

Something has to move it out of “someday”

Say you’ve wanted to visit Japan for years. You’ve watched the videos, saved the places, and told yourself you’ll go eventually.

Then you book the flight.

You're not in Japan yet. Your current life has barely changed. The trip is still months away. But the sentence in your head changes from:

"I want to go to Japan."

to:

"I'm going to Japan in March."

The excitement still surfaces when the trip crosses your mind. But before the booking, you're thinking about something that might happen. Afterward, you're looking ahead to something that's been arranged. A ticket and a date exist whether or not the trip is on your mind.

The booking doesn't make the trip happen now. It changes what thinking about it means.

But a date can't explain the feeling on its own. Your future may already be full of things that are real, chosen, and approaching, and many of them leave you flat.

A good future can still leave you flat

You can want the promotion without wanting the interview. You can value the business without feeling excited about the launch. You can want the body while tomorrow's training feels like another demand.

Those goals may still matter. You may have chosen them for good reasons. Some parts may even excite you.

But wanting what a future might earn, prove, fix, or allow later isn't the same as wanting the experience that's actually approaching.

Excitement doesn't require the experience to be easy. A race can hurt and still pull you toward it. A difficult conversation can make you nervous and still be something you want to have.

There has to be some genuine pull toward living through it, not only toward owning the result afterward.

That's why a calendar can be full of useful, respectable, self-chosen events and still leave you flat. The things that become real fastest often carry deadlines, consequences, or other people's expectations. The things you want more personally are easier to leave vague.

Importance can justify a future. It can't make you excited to live through it.

So before you make another future real, answer a harder question:

Do you want to live through what's approaching, or do you only want what it could give you afterward?

Choose what you actually want to live through

Name the part you'd genuinely want to be there for.

"Have a better social life" is too broad. Friday night with people you miss is an experience. "Do more creative work" is too broad. Releasing one piece you care about is an experience.

If you can't name a part of the future you'd want to live through, it may still be worth pursuing. But it's a poor choice for making life feel exciting again.

Once you can name it, ask:

What would need to change for this to become part of my actual future?

The move might be paying for the first lesson, submitting the work, registering to volunteer, or agreeing on a day with someone. It should change what's ahead of you, not merely make you feel better tonight.

One event won't make life permanently exciting. That's not the promise.

The point is to stop filling your future only with things you need, respect, or think you should do while everything you genuinely want to experience remains optional.

You don't need every part of life to excite you.

But something ahead should make you glad it's getting closer.
